Question 1: COMPREHENSION:

Read the following comprehension passage and then answer the questions that follow.

The connection between spirit and body may be age old, but as healing become a science, western practitioners moved away from spirituality and religious faith. Now patients demand, coupled with several scientific studies correlating faith with good health, is slowly converting a skeptical medical community. Scientific journals and many new books are taking up the subject. Doctors are attending conferences on faith and healing in increasing numbers.

“I think it’s part of the general return to spirituality,” says Carol Hawsman, a clinical psychologist who six years ago started the Washington Jewish Healing Network. The organization holds spiritual support groups for people who are ill. “Baby boomers are watching their parents getting older, seeing themselves ageing and they are searching for depth and meaning.”

A wave of recent studies is chipping away at the wall between church and the laboratory. Research has shown, for example, that those people who attend religious services more than once a week live on average, seven years longer than those who don’t.

A 1998 study by Duke University Medical Centre doctors Harold Koenig and David Larson found that those people who attend church weekly were not as likely to be hospitalized, and when they were, they did not spend as much time in hospital as those who went to church less frequently.

Hundreds of research studies document a link between faith and health among the positive effects of piety.

Lower blood pressure. In a 1989 study of 400 Caucasian men in Evans County, Georgia, Duke University researchers found a significant protective effect against high blood pressure among those who considered religion very important and who attended church regularly.

Good mental health. Attendance at a house of worship is related to lower rates of depression and anxiety, reported a 1999 Duke University study of nearly 400 older adults.

These correlations can be partially explained by the fact that church goers are less likely to smoke, drink or engage in risky sexual behaviour and they are more likely to have a network of social support. In The Faith Factor: Proof of the Healing Power of Prayer internist Dale Mathews points out that organized religion provides a community to do and be done for – bake biscuits, visit, help out. And studies show that people who are isolated are more likely to do poorly both psychologically and physically.

“You hate me! You never liked me! You only came to my school to spy on me because you are jealous of me you ugly witch, you pretender!” This was too much for Vera.

“I sacrificed a golden chance to be with you stupid girl and you return it with nothing but insults!” Tears welled in her eyes and she dashed them away angrily with her fist; then she grabbed her sister just as their mother burst into the room. Elizabeth managed to cool down tempers somewhat and took Vera aside as the more reasonable one.

“Leave your sister alone! I expected better of you Vera, I really did.” Vera sniffed angrily, madder now at the uncontrollable dams that were in her eyes. When would she ever learn not to take everything so to heart?

A semblance of normality was restored, but the relationship between the twins had received a blow from which it would never fully recover.

Question 3: Oral Literature (20 Marks)

Read the following poem and answer the questions on it.

GRANDMOTHER

I hadn't asked her much,
just how she felt,
and she told me all about her day,
and how she'd washed the sheets
and how she could not understand why the towel got so heavy
when it was wet.

She'd also sunned the mattresses
such tired bones and so much to do,
and my eyes filled with tears,
when I thought of how I was simply going to say 'salaam' and walk away
and so many words would have been trapped inside her.

I would have passed by as if
what lay between those bedclothes
was just old life
and not really my grandmother.
